

Time
Before	Later
After	Then
During	Previously
Next	While
Space
Above	In front of
Under	Near
Behind	Beyond
Far from	Adjacent Importance
Importantly	Essentially
Especially	Indeed
Most of all	Best of all
Chief among them	Worse still
Compare/Contrast
Although	Even though
However	Nevertheless
Similarly	Likewise
In a similar way	By the same token
Cause/Effect
Thus	As a result
Because of	Consequently
Accordingly	results in
Therefore	Since
Problem/Solution
If...then...	Therefore
One problem is	An answer is
A possible solution	A difficulty is
To fix this situation	One idea is Generalization/Example
For example	For instance
such as	As an illustration
To illustrate	Generally
Usually	Often

Organization

Writing should have organization. As a writer, your choices with organization affect how easily your reader can understand the way your ideas relate. As a reader, understanding organizational conventions can help you predict what a text will discuss. Transition words often help show readers what organization the writer attempts. Writers should write to help readers.

Sentence Organization

Sentences can move between ideas. By understanding the relationship between sentences, readers can guess what the writer is focusing on. By showing readers relationships between ideas, writers can express their ideas clearly.

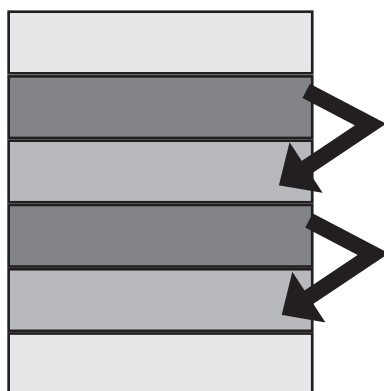

There are many types of communication devices, such as phones, chatbots, and webcams.

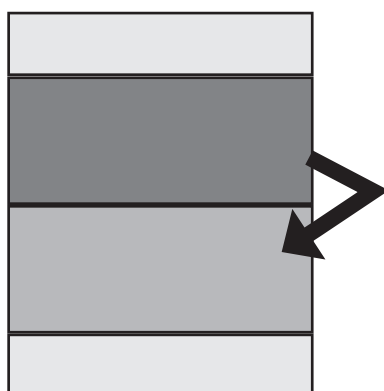

Many inventions have improved communication between people. For example, the phone has helped people chat anytime, anywhere.

Section Organization

Sometimes, writers organize support sentences into sections that accomplish a specific purpose. Sometimes, these tell information about subtopics in point sections. Other times, these divide subtopics into block sections.

Cats make better apartment pets than dogs. Cats need less space than dogs. Most of the time cats sleep. Dogs, though, like to run around. Also, cats keep themselves cleaner than dogs. Cats lick themselves often and use litter well. Dogs need more training. Cats are the best apartment pets.

Cats make better apartment pets than dogs. Cats adapt well to apartments. Most of the time cats sleep. Cats lick themselves often and use litter well. Dogs are less suited for apartment life. Dogs like to run around. Dogs need more training for the bathroom. Cats are the best apartment pets.